Anyone who's worked for a small business knows that nothing is ever certain when it comes to cash flow. There are days when invoices are all paid, and it's high living, and days when the accounts are drained and credit is strained — it's not necessarily bad business as much as it is a reality of business, particularly small business.

Jim Trickett was familiar with that small business environment, and then ArchivesOne acquired the storage company he worked for. Today things are very different.

"If something breaks we can have it replaced immediately," Trickett said.

Trickett, a regional V.P. for the Ohio-Michigan Market, simply explained how the corporate backing of ArchivesOne not only helps people do what they need to do, but in some regards makes them feel better about doing it.

"Right from the start, ArchivesOne put some money into our fleet." He noted the company's support for its new drivers did more than just help them make the rounds, "It really improved morale."

Like all who face a new ownership structure, Trickett had some concerns when ArchivesOne acquired the business, but he trusted his former employers and put his faith into his new ones. Besides the improvements to the fleet, he quickly saw many other benefits to working for ArchivesOne; including two promotions, and new technology upgrades. "We had a software system that was substandard," he said of the old days. "ArchivesOne took a broader look at the process ... a streamlined approach, that left room for subtle differences that our existing clients had grown accustomed to."

What Jim describes is the always-improving ArchivesOne Core Operating Procedures. While the company holds a strict line on how business should be conducted, it evaluates the strengths of each company it acquires and adopts those ideas. The result is a better working environment for employees while constantly adopting new and improved processes. A change, Trickett says, everyone seems to enjoy.

"We still service the customer the same ... but they also enjoy the new benefits of ArchivesOne."
